Peace of mind for all

Arranging the funeral of a loved one is one of the hardest things you can do, and for many of us, one of the most important. With so many different traditions and customs here today, the ceremony can take a variety of forms.

Different perspectives on grieving and bereavement

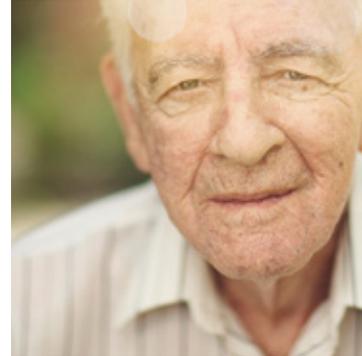

Moving to a foreign country is a big step. For many, the knowledge you will pass away and be buried outside your country of origin can feel traumatic. In the north-east of Götaland, there are several religious communities representing different cultures which play a major role in this respect, offering invaluable support at a difficult time. Fonus has forged close links with a number of them, and we do all we can to ease the burden of bereavement and funeral arrangement.

How does it work?

Under Swedish law, municipalities and county councils always bear the initial responsibility in the case of bereavement. When the time comes for the funeral, it is the loved ones – family and relatives, most commonly – who take over, in partnership with the funeral home. Thereafter, the religious community steps in.

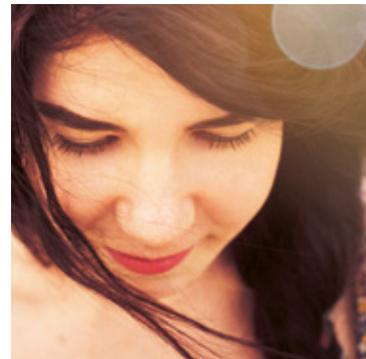

Offering knowledge and experience

Fonus is committed to arranging a dignified funeral, regardless of the nationality or religion of the deceased. All our staff receive training on cultural differences and customs, and our advisers have a wealth of experience to draw upon.

The background is a solid teal color. Overlaid on this are several abstract, white, hand-drawn style lines that form overlapping loops and curves, creating a sense of movement and depth. In the top right corner, there is a white rectangular area with a scalloped border, containing the text 'Affix stamp here'.
